Gargoyle Collection

by Castart Studios

These curious creatures were originally built into 13th & 14th C. buildings to act as drain spouts, channelling rainwater away from the masonry, where it could do damage to mortar. Later, these strange, mystical and sometimes downright weird human/animal creations were used to ornament buildings. Perhaps the best known are the gargoyles of Notre Dame in Paris. Architect Eugene Viollet-Le-Duc (1814-79) was able to recreate the authentic spirit of the Gothic Era. We do not always see these wonderful creations as we walk through our cities; however they are always observing us.

Japanese Lanterns

by Castart Studios

a Stone lanterns were developed in 16th century Japan as a method of lighting garden paths leading to tearooms. Traditional tea ceremonies were often held in the evening. Guests would be expected to attain a certain level of mental refinement before reaching the tearooms, aided by strolling through peaceful inner garden. Every element of the tea ceremony was designed to discourage distraction and promote inner harmony. Various forms of lantern evolved including Yukima-gata (snow-viewing lanterns).

Yukima-gata are characterised by their low posture and open legged design. They are the most common type of lantern and are often found near water. They derive their name from the way that snow delicately gathers on their roofs.

Ikekomi-gata lack a pedestal base and are therefore held steady by being buried in the ground. They are found throughout the tea garden, particularly close to a special handwashing bowl, known as a tsukubai.
